As with first impressions, you never get a second chance to make an initial public offering. Google just squandered with its IPO and it will pay. The Wall Street Journal, which reported the deal, should be ashamed. The company's shareholders and the public deserve better. The Journal has failed to live up to its reputation. I hope that Google will learn from its mistakes.

In spite of the difficulties, we very much admire Google's "why not?" approach to employing "why not?" approach and predicting the future. There are plenty of vested interests that would block the company's expansion. However, if Google can raise the capital necessary to support its growth, it will continue to be a force in the marketplace.

With the potential of the internet on the horizon, it is clear that the focus of the market has shifted. The internet is no longer just a tool for communication, but a platform for business and commerce. The opportunity to build a successful business on the internet is greater than ever before.

For startups, who have the makings of the next big thing, the internet provides an opportunity to reach a global audience. With the right strategy and execution, startups can achieve significant growth and success.

However, it is important to note that not all startups will succeed. Competition is fierce, and only a small percentage of startups will achieve significant growth and success. It is important for startups to have a clear plan and strategy for success.

In conclusion, the internet provides a significant opportunity for startups and established businesses alike. With the right strategy and execution, businesses can achieve significant growth and success. It is important for businesses to stay ahead of the curve and embrace the opportunities that the internet provides.
